Question 1

Read carefully the poem in which the poet explores how books can change lives.

The Welcome

You were running on broken glass, a child chased by nightmares down battered streets, until at last you came to this door. Here are rooms made of hope, shelves full of voices that call you in. They say you can stop running now, pull out a chair and sit. For you, they lay

5

a table with a feast that tastes of places in your dreams, honey from the hive, warm bread, words like spices.
This is where people come alive

10

to speak their stories in ink and blood on wild nights, dappled afternoons, telling of fallen tyrants¹, drought and flood under desert stars and arctic moons.

15

They spin legends and conjure myths in mother tongues and other tongues that give your accent to their dance with death, their love of life, the songs they sing.

You have been welcomed in to books that smell like ancient trees, standing here with broken spines, opening like thoughts set free and as the pages turn, your breath quickens with something you always knew in your blood like remembered faith.

When you open the book, it opens you.
